

As I view the current landscape in educational measurement, I see a great need for NCME to accomplish its service missions of disseminating knowledge about best practices in educational assessment, and informing public policy on how educational assessments can be used to improve education. At the same time, I see educational testing being increasingly criticized. We are at a crossroads where we can either become smaller, more insular, and technocratic; or we can expand our organization by better engaging in the public and political discourse on the role of educational tests in education... From the Editor
Megan Welsh, University of California, Davis

Welcome to the June 2019 issue! In it, we welcome our new president, Steve Sireci, who answers our Spotlight questions via podcast and presents his initiatives and priorities. Several contributors also share information related to Steve's work. Molly Faulkner Bond wrote a piece on the importance of test validity to all education research, and how validity plays a role in the work Institute of Education Sciences grantees. Darius Taylor addresses the role of test validity and test fairness in social justice. We also hear tips on working with reporters from Catherine Gewertz, get an update on the ITEMS portal from André Rupp, learn about what grad students get out of service from Erin Winters (Steve's podcast also touches on this) and hear about opting out of district assessments from Legal Corner contributor Michelle Croft.

Legal Corner: A New Twist on Testing Opt-Outs: A Legal Analysis of the Right to Opt Out of District Tests

Michelle Croft, ACT

A few months ago, I was asked about an interesting twist on the question of opt-outs. Instead of focusing on opting a student out of a state summative assessment, the question was related to the ability of a parent to opt their child out of a district assessment.
